

To the FCC:

I am concerned about the consolidation of more media outlets in the hands of fewer corporate owners. I do believe that increased opportunity for ownership consolidation will result in decreased access to local community oriented media information and programming and the loss of variety in entertainment and opinion to which we are routinely exposed. In the modern world there are of course other means to access the full spectrum of opinions, news and entertainment if an individual pursues them dilligently enough or stumbles upon them.

But that's not the point. The FCC's mission is not to protect the rights of corporations to pursue their economic interests. It is to protect the public's rights to a diversity of information and entertainment on the public airwaves.
